The Japan Tourism Agency has conducted a nationwide survey of onsens regarding their policy on tattoos, due to the increased number of foreign tourists.

The survey, which was sent to 3,700 operators of inns and other facilities with onsens, asks them: “Do you refuse admittance to people with tattoos?” and “Would you accept someone with tattoos if they cover them with stickers?” and “Do you know the reason for the custom of barring people with tattoos?”

According to the agency, in 2014, one-third of foreign tourists indicated onsens as one of their main reasons for visiting Japan, behind Japanese food and shopping, Sports Nippon reported Friday. However, the agency said tour operators had received feedback from visitors expressing their disappointment and bewilderment at being turned away from onsens due to their tattoos.

In Japan, tattoos are associated with yakuza organized crime syndicates, and many public institutions bar people who have them as a way to keep gangsters out. Many Japanese onsen operators are apparently unaware of the role of tattoos in some cultures.

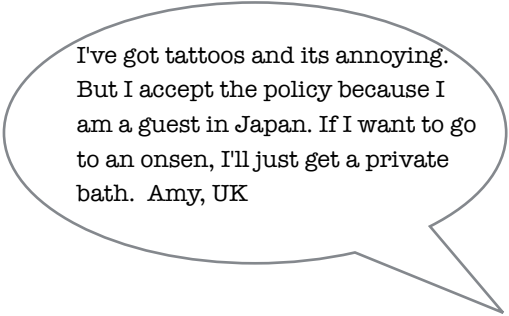

In 2013, the issue gained a lot of media attention after a Maori woman was barred from a public bath in Hokkaido because of her traditional face tattoos.

The spa has a ban on people with body art.

After the incident, an official from the public bath said the decision had been made to avoid making other guests uncomfortable. “Even if it is traditional culture, it is difficult to expect other patrons to understand the difference between one tattoo and another. A typical person cannot judge the context behind the tattoos,” the official said.

Japan is aiming to have 20 million tourists visit annually by 2020. Tourism officials say how businesses accept other cultures is crucial for the industry.

The tourism agency said it will release the results of the survey at the end of June.
